

Hidden Gem: Roserberg Palace

By: Kimberly Clark

When in Sweden, I can't help but oooh and aaah every time I tour a palace. Especially a palace whose stories are written in vast silk tapestries walls and are tales of romance, superstitions, war and defeat.

For Swedes, it may seem so normal to see fortresses, castles, and palaces in the backdrops of cities. But for me, it is definitely still a novelty. There is something very magical about palaces to me and I was super excited to visit

Roserberg Palace – one of the Royal Palaces of Sweden. Situated on the breath-taking shores of Lake Mälaren, on the outskirts of Stockholm, it was built in the 1630s by the Oxenstierna family and became a royal palace in 1762.

In and around Stockholm there are quite a few palaces. Some of them that appear on multiple tourist itineraries to visit, while others only experienced when venturing a bit off the beaten path. Roserberg Palace is truly one of Sweden's hidden gems.

Get a true feel for the palace on a guided tour around the rooms and halls to experience a true unaltered royal atmosphere and learn more about royal interiors and art from the late 18th and early 19th century.

On the morning of our tour, there were no crowds in sight. I didn't feel like I was being pushed through every room and squeezed through all the doorways. I didn't have to wait for the "perfect shot" to capture the colorful, elegant and sophisticated royal rooms.

The palace boasts the finest examples and best-kept royal interiors in Sweden and the rooms have remained untouched since then with well-preserved period features, furniture and collections. It's apparent that this palace has been well preserved and is an excellent example of the period culture and life as the interior of each room takes you back in time to the royal authentic period.

But wait, don't leave without taking a stroll in the magnificent gardens to admire the French baroque style. Roserberg Palace is one of the best kept secrets of Sweden's royal palaces.

At Roserberg time stands still. Above all else, if you're like me you like your palaces old and void of all modern amenities.
